In 2000 he became Director-General at the BBC. He reorganised the structure and reduced administration costs from 24% to 15% of total income. In the course of four years he started four digital TV channels, five new radio networks and helped create Freeview. He also demonstrated a commitment to cultural diversity, both in staff and output. His direct, down to earth, management style has been widely praised for reinvigorating BBC morale and creativity.

After leaving the BBC in 2004 Greg was made Chancellor of the University of York; Chairman of HIT, a large international television production company specialising in programmes for the under fives in 2005; and in 2006 he became Chairman of Brentford Football Club. He is also a member of the supervisory board of ProSiebenSat.1, one of Europe's largest free to air broadcasting groups. In 2008 he succeeded the late Anthony Mingella as Chairman of the British Film Institute and in 2009 became Chairman of ATG, Britain's biggest theatre group. He is also an advisor on leadership to the NHS.

As a speaker, Greg shares his insights as the entire media sector undergoes major shifts and struggles to adapt to a new competitive environment. He also reflects on the challenges facing any leader under intense pressure – and considers how you bring change to a monolith when it's become part of the fabric of national life.
